What's new:

map with the arcs reflected about the axes, to see if any localities could be excluded. If not, sometimes it is necessary to compute credible sets on the display using Bayesian statistics; this may be done using the R vcd package^[@CR90], along with alternate packages such as R vglr^[@CR89] and R vrs^[@CR93]. Among other things, this produces an evidence map showing the set of localities whose posterior probability of being in a given locality does not fade to zero as the number of cuts is increased^[@CR92]. Here, we chose a high number of cuts, but there are of course many more things to do to use the R package R vcd. We also evaluated the strontium isotope signatures of the selected ten selected localities using the most recent published values for the Red Hill Holes locality. Values from the literature are usually only available for selected individuals in the same context as the unknown sample. Where distributions of strontium isotope ratios have been measured in hundreds of individuals from a single known population then the odds are good that there is some as-yet unused population value that might match these individuals. For a novel population, however, the projected distributions at different ages are never observed. Dating of the bilinear strontium--lead disequilibrium begins with reliable upper and lower bounds on the age of tooth enamel^{[@CR53],[@CR55]}. For the Upper Palaeolithic, the preferred method involves measuring a normal dataset of six dates of in situ radiocarbon dates in two or three members of the sample. The most probable lower bound on the sample consists of the twelve youngest dates in the sample, and the most probable upper bound is the oldest date in the sample^[@CR55]. In practice, the 99% marginal likelihood interval for the oldest date in the sample is from 2170 cal BP to 2630 cal BP. The projected upper and lower bounds for the sample as a whole are obtained by weighting the individual 99% ranges using the asymptotic density of lognormal^{[@CR47],[@CR55]}. Dating of the lead--strontium isotopic system in tooth enamel follows the same procedures. Here, the most probable lower bound of the sample is obtained from the oldest date in the sample, 20
